of sellers' time is spent on administrative and non-selling duties, like researching prospects, manually entering sales data, and preparing for meetings¹

The role of a seller is getting harder

Sellers today must balance ever-increasing performance expectations with countless admin duties—all without sacrificing their ability to provide personalized experiences to their customers. The lack of focus time can negatively impact sellers' ability to enjoy their work, manage time efficiently, and develop sales strategies.

of surveyed sellers say the expectations of success have increased in the last year²

79%

of surveyed sellers support more customers and accounts now than they did one year ago²

The AI opportunity for sales

AI can significantly boost seller productivity—and company revenue as a result.

Top tasks surveyed sellers want AI to help with¹

- Understanding customer needs and preferences by helping collect, analyze, and predict customer data
- Helping automate processes and simplifying tedious tasks
- Providing capacity to improve productivity

99%

of surveyed sellers said that if AI saved them an hour, they would reinvest that time on work tasks²

10-20%

increase in sales ROI and 3-15% boost in revenue for companies that invest in AI³

Microsoft sellers relied on too many tools

Sellers were switching between as many as 40 tools per day to get their work done, resulting in a lot of wasted time and stress. Microsoft's IT org also had a hard time managing the increasing tech sprawl.¹
